The community college is a garden tended with care by faculty privileged to teach there. We nurture each flower sheltered in this garden, knowing that with love and encouragement, its growth will be unique, its stem strong, and its blossom beautiful in its fullness.

Real learning is a private matter; the “teachable moment” is synonymous with desire to learn. Thus, the purest motive of a teacher is to love the subject enough to introduce it well and then let it go unsupervised into the mind of another. We as teachers must trust that the material and process will always resonate within the minds of receptive students who meet the subject in their own time, on their own terms, as we once did.
